This course will take us to different areas of the Francophone world, from Guadeloupe and Martinique to the Ivory Coast, Senegal and Congo while passing by Paris, Antibes and Montreal. The authors studied in this course write in a language inherited from colonialism. Therefore, we will start our journey by reflecting on the complex and problematic notion of Francophonie. Readings include novels by Ahmadou Kourouma, Alain Mabanckou, Maryse Condé and Dany Laferrière but we will also watch a movie by Ousmane Sembène and read poems by notable Caribbean authors such as Césaire, Glissant and René Depestre. This course can also be considered as an introduction to postcolonial studies: theoretical articles accompanying the readings will help us achieve a better understanding of some of the important questions and concepts that contribute to the new and evolving field of Francophone postcolonial studies.

If these tasks look daunting, fear not: this course is conceived as a collaborative project. What I mean by this is that everyone will be able to contribute, each in their own capacity. While there will be some lecture moments, most of the class will be structured around in-class discussions. In addition, research and writing workshops will be organized during the semester.

This course aims to give students a new appreciation of Hispanic culture while improving their written and conversational skills through Spanish-language cinema. The content of this course will revolve around contemporary (and historical) issues in Latin America. The topics represented in the films include the reasons that motivate Latin American immigration, racial discrimination in Latin America, resistance to oppressive political forces, universal human rights in the face of a globalized economy, and processes of individuation. Students will have the opportunity (and be required) to discuss these issues in depth verbally as well as in written form in Spanish. Students will come away with a nuanced and vivid understanding of the contemporary Latin American experience. The course is taught in Spanish.
