successfull keep people with mental health issues in treatment and out of jail, it takes partnerships with organizations outside the judicial branch and dedicated case workers.

Ever one Me er saw in her courtroom that morning had been diagnosed with a severe and persistent mental illness, a traumatic brain injur or an intellectual and developmental disorder — including the college student who stole the vitamins.

Instead of going to criminal court, the student had agreed to abide b a treatment plan and check in regular with Me er and a probation officer for a set amount of time.

In return, Me er agreed to put her guilt plea on hold during that time — a sta of adjudication — and then dismiss it if the student successfull completed the program.

The student appeared to be well on her wa. She said she was stabilized on medication, holding a 4.0 grade-point average and just starting an internship.

Me er smiled.

"You're doing great," the judge said. "Keep it up."

Special courts spreading nationwide

The use of special diversionar courts for people with substance abuse problems or mental illness has expanded rapidle since the nation's first drug court was established in 1989 in Miami.

Their goal is to keep people in treatment rather than incarcerated. Their rising popularit is driven b the increasing number of people with substance abuse or mental health issues filling jails and prisons since states began closing mental institutions in the 1960s in favor of communit -based treatment options that were never properl funded.

[ Advocates of Kansas mental health courts sa lives improved, taxpa er dollars saved]

Me er's court reserves Wednesda s for misdemeanor offenders. Those who commit non-violent felonies are also eligible for mental health court but have hearings on Tuesda s.

Before a set of Wednesda morning hearings, Me er sat at the head of a long table in a 14th floor conference room of the count judicial building. The court is part of the count 's judicial branch, but also receives support from a federal grant and state agencies that work in mental health.

A cit prosecutor sat to one side of Me er, a public defender on the other. Me er's staffers, a social worker, a person who speer'snj9.nfg1er.

Several people around the table groaned and one let out a mild expletive.

Probation officers key

The probation officers are the foot soldiers in the Hennepin Count mental health court's model.

The monitor random drug and alcohol tests and medication adherence, set up stop-gap ps chiatric appointments for people in crisis and help coordinate housing and emplo ment assistance.

Me er tells the program participants to call their probation officer if the need help.

But several of the probation officers said help can sometimes be hard to find —

Another officer said she received a call from one of her participants whose two oung children were starting school the next da and needed supplies. She made a shopping trip and delivered two full backpacks later that night.

That's not in the job description, but she said the trust she built with that one act will go a long wa if she ever needs to treto convince the woman to take her medications or go to therap.

More ucce e than failure

Treatment compliance can be an ongoing struggle for some participants. If the decide not to comple with their treatment protocol, Me er can send them back to traditional criminal court to face the charges she put on hold when the joined the program.

That appeared the likel outcome for one of the participants in September. His probation officer told Me er that the man was refusing treatment, even though he admitted he had trouble controlling his anger and alcohol intake.

"That's what he said: He's not willing to do treatment and he's not willing to do therap," the officer said.

Me er sighed.

"I hope he's willing to do time," she said. " ecause that's about all I got left."

Dropouts are the minorit in Me er's mental health court. About 60 percent of those who enter the program complete it, and even those who drop out tend to require fewer hospitalizations and incarcerations afterward.

The court is funded with local dollars supplemented b state and federal grants that require extensive reporting on outcomes.

"We're prett well aware of our recidivism rates and our graduation rates and our relapse rates," Me er said. "We keep track of it, and we think we're doing well and reducing the number of new criminal cases among our population."

- As inmates' mental health needs sk rocket, KDOC works to adapt
- KDOC steps up supports for parolees with mental health issues
- Mental health issues drive some Kansans to repeated jail sta s